New internal door Toca from Huga A minimalist design without lever handles

With the new Toca internal door, traditional door manufacturer Huga is once again setting new standards when it comes to design and functionality. Rather than a classic lever handle, the Toca features a milled handle bar that integrates perfectly into the overall appearance of the door leaf thanks to the timber or glass insert. The result is an elegant, minimalistic look that blends seamlessly into modern architectural concepts.

In today's interior design of modern homes, internal doors are much more than just functional elements – they are essential design elements that have a significant impact on the character of a room. A highlight of the Toca is its concealed track application system, whereby neither door hinges nor conventional lever handle sets are visible. Rather than a classic lever handle, the Toca has a milled handle bar that integrates perfectly into the overall appearance of the door leaf thanks to the horizontally insert. The Toca is available in various designs, including variants with timber or glass inserts. The timber insert can be selected either in the robust Durat surface finish or as an elegant real lacquer version. The Toca is offered in a high-quality real lacquer surface finish as standard, whereby architects, building owners and property developers can choose from six preferred colours: white, grey, “Hygge” grey, taupe, anthracite and black. For individual colour designs, the door can also be painted in almost any RAL colour from the K5 colour fan to perfectly match the desired room concept.

The minimalist design of the Toca is enhanced by the omission of a visible latch. Instead, an innovative magnetic closure ensures that the door is held securely without the need for lock latches or conventional latches. The magnetic holding force reliably holds the door in position and enhances the clean, modern look.
